- Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibit government agencies that receive federal funds from discriminating against individuals because of their race, color, or national origin. This is the case even when such funding is indirect, or via a grant, contract or subcontract. This also applies to all programs or services provided by that agency, even those not supported by any government funds. No government agency can deny, delay or restrict an individual's access to a service or benefit because they were born or raised by people who were born outside the United States. Such agencies must not operate such programs in a way that discriminates against such persons.
